Two ideals unquestionably inspire men and bring them under their spell - the Socialist and the National ideals. For these two ideals men have been ready to, if necessary die for. If an ideal can so inspire a man that he is prepared to give his life for it, then it holds within it a mighty and a kindling force. National Socialism takes these two ideals and to fuses them into a single whole so that the nation and people will be saved. If not, the nation will more and more tear itself into pieces, and will finally go down in impotence and ruin.

He who in this people sympathises with the poorest of its citizens, who in this people see in every individual a valuable member of the whole community, and who recognises that this community can flourish only when it is formed not of rulers and oppressed but only when all according to their capacities fulfill their duty to their Land and the Community of the people are valued accordingly, he who seeks to preserve the native vigour, the strength and the youthful energy of the millions of working men, and who above all is concerned that our precious possession, our youth, should not before its time be used up in unhealthy, harmful work - he is not merely a Socialist, but he is also a National in the highest sense of that word.

We are National Socialists, We say to ourselves to be 'National' means above everything to act with a boundless and all-embracing love for our people, and if necessary, even to die for them. And similarly to be 'Social' means so to build up the State and the community of the people that every individual acts in the interest of the community of the people and must be to such an extent convinced of the goodness, of the honourable straightforwardness of the National Community of the people and to be ready to die for it

There are three words which many use without a thought which for us are no catch-phrases: Love, Faith and Hope. We National Socialists wish to love our Race and Culture, we wish to learn to love it jealously, to love it alone and to suffer no other idol to stand by its side. We know only one interest and that is the interests of our people alone.
